

Ericsson, the veteran inventor, was eighty-one years old recently. He is in excellent health, and works, it is said, sixteen hours a day, thus proving and exception to the general rule. Perhaps it might be fairly asserted that men live longer than all men; that work is, after all, the true elixir of life. Many noteworthy instances of long life, connects with remarkable mental activity will easily occur to the reader.

Was not Sophie more than ninety, when, to prove that he was not in his dotage—as his heirs claimed, in order to get his money—he wrote one of his greatest tracts? Did not Hume, at the age of eighty-four, write four more than many might do at forty? Goethe, as every one knows, died with pen in hand at the age of eighty-two. Von Ranke, the foremost of living historians, has just published another volume of his Universal History; he will be eighty-nine years old next December.

Longfellow, old some of his best work short before his death, at the age of eighty-three, and Whittier is now two years older than that. The vast energies, which sum in many directions are known as Victor Hugo shows no signs of decrepitude, although it is more than eighty-two years since Victor Hugo was born. Voltaire died at eight-four. Thiers and Michelet at seventy-six; Mignet at eighty-four; and the great Bancroft, now eighty-four and George Ticknor lived to eighty. In public life we have had several recent examples of great men whose power for statesmanship did not diminish through age. Gladstone is nearly seventy-five and Palmerston was Prime Minister at the time of his death, two days before he had completed his eighty-third year. Benjamin Franklin in the last century, lived to be eighty-four.

Raphael, Mozart, Byron, Burns and Schubert succumbed just at an age when most men reach their prime, but it must not be forgotten that the last three undermined their health by excesses. Shakespeare, Napoleon, Caesar and Boethius received their crowns in their respective departments, died at between fifty and sixty. But on the other hand, Michael Angelo, than whom no man expended more energy, upon his vast achievements, lived to ninety, and Titian was ninety-nine. It is evident therefore, that while no strict law can be established there is a relation between longevity and labor. Work preserves the health, while idleness tends to weaken it.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Barbecue Scenes in Georgia.

Last Friday night the woods on the outskirts of Atlanta, Georgia, were filled with smoke and appearance. The night was intensely dark, and here and there were blazing fires in the background. The attendant cooks for the feast of the morrow could be seen placing carcasses upon spits, and all night long, using long poles, laying at the ends staves of mustard, with which the meats were kept thoroughly saturated.

The barbecue was found, perhaps 5,000 country folks assembled. The smell of the fresh woods the aroma from the spits, the jocular salutations, so much recalling Longstreet's Georgia scene, all conspired to give an exhilarating effect to the scene. The orators were also there, at the head of whom was Congressmen Milton Chapman.

The Governor of Georgia was received in style of elegance, and hearty cheers showed the approbation of the people. A little distance off were arranged long tables, capable of accommodating 100 persons each. The fragments were temptingly arranged, and when the feast was given, the meat was ready a round table for the leaders. One table was especially reserved for distinguished guests. The master of ceremonies, in calling the eaters to order, drew their attention to one beautifully browned carcass. He narrated that it was none other than the famous bull, so famous as to have been over 1,000 pounds.

Twenty years ago, as a great of mature judgment, the animal had appeared on the mountain. For eight years he jumped from crag to crag and won a State reputation. Growing older he took up his residence in Clarkston, where for four years he butted his way. A citizen shot at a mad dog on Friday. He was the dog, but the bullet missed him, and the goat, whose goat's appearance on the table as the chief dish, it was not long before the whole party were discussing the delicacy of the old goat's flesh.—Philadelphian Item.

A Clever Dodge.

The circumstances under which the son of Consul Dusei, recently captured by brigands near Honolulu, was liberated without paying a ransom, are related as follows by the Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph. They were surrounded by a detachment of troops under orders not to attack until the young man should be taken. While the troops had no want of provisions, especially of wine.

M. Dusei, their captive, suggested that he should be allowed to write to his father to send a few bottles, which was readily assented to. M. Dusei accordingly wrote the letter; but, as none of the band could read, he proposed that a strong name should be mixed with the wine, and that a small quantity of the fluid should be promised to the messenger if he assisted him to escape.

The plan was carried out. When the wine arrived the brigands eagerly partook of it, and were soon stupefied by the effects of the narcotic it contained. M. Dusei and his guides were then enabled to reach the nearest village on the road, under the command of General Mehemet Pacia. The member of the band who contrived to M. Dusei's escape has received the $500 promised to him, and will not be in any way molested by the authorities.—Saint James's Gazette.

Dupont's Adventure.

Mr. Dupont, who was recently removed from the enjoyment of £20,000 by an explosion, was probably the largest manufacturer of explosives in the world. One of the most daring achievements recorded in the history of the present century is one of which he is the central figure. During the Crimean War the Russian Government ran short of powder, and Dupont was required to furnish a full defense of Sevastopol. A cargo was purchased from the Duponts in America, and was placed in a steamer lying off Baltimore. The British had frigates posted in waiting outside the Chesapeake. After several feints the watchers were eluded, and a chase began across the Atlantic, through the straits and up the Mediterranean. With fortune also good fortune the vessel passed through the Bosphorus and into the Black Sea unscathed; but when nearing the place of contention, the English war ships haled the stranger. Young Dupont was at the helm himself, and insisted that the vessel proceed, not heeding the signals from the warships. The English frigates closed to the vessel, but she was able to steam ahead and steer through the rocks, and was beached inside the Russian lines. This daring adventure saved the cargo, for which the Russian Government paid $3,000,000.—London Echo.

"A great deal has been said at different times," says Mr. Logan, reported in the Philadelphia Times, "about the assistance I render to the General in the performance of his public duties. I did him a favor by giving him of many details, but it is not right to say that I was instrumental in getting him the position. I take charge of his correspondence, and I do this because the General is very conscientious. I read all his letters and lay all their contents before him. Most public men are at the mercy of their private secretaries, who do not have their interests at heart and who often abuse the confidence reposed in them. Every correspondent in making a reasonable request is entitled to some sort of response. The General has never deceived any one, because he has known the contents of all his correspondence. I have also done much copying, and have marked authority on various subjects upon which he proposed to speak. I believe to the best of my knowledge that the glory of their husbands is their glory."
